Copyright and Copiers

Almond 20th Century Club Library

The Almond Library complies with federal copyright law. It is the intent of this law to protect the rights of copyright owners from unauthorized reproduction of their works. This includes works that have been fixed in any format, including print, audio, video, and computer files, whether or not they have been published.

However, the law also recognizes the public benefit of allowing citizens to do limited copying from copyrighted works for educational purposes. Under the precepts of fair use, library patrons may copy or print parts of copyrighted works for one-time, educational, non-profit activities. Copying that would replace or infringe upon a commercial sale of a copyrighted work (such as copying a work in its entirety, copying something for repeated use, or making exceedingly numerous copies of the same item) is not allowed. In such cases, library patrons should seek permission from the copyright owner before proceeding.

The library provides a printer for the limited lawful use of its patrons. While library staff act in good faith by informing library patrons about copyright law and its restrictions, they cannot be liable for the acts of individual patrons using library materials or equipment.
